Voting rights

of the Bill of Rights, as the groups had argued.

The dissenting justices said that ignores long-held precedent by the Kansas Supreme Court. Justice Eric Rosen said "it staggers my imagination" to conclude Kansas citizens have no fundamental right to vote and called the majority opinion a "betrayal of our constitutional duty to safeguard the foundational rights of Kansans."

Justice Melissa Taylor Standridge called the decision troubling, with far-reaching implications, and that the ruling "defies history, law, and logic and is just plain wrong."

"For over 60 years, this interpretation of section 2 has been our precedent," she wrote. "Without even a hint that it's doing so, the majority overturns this precedent today."

WHAT ARE THE IMPLICATIONS OF THE RULING?

A determination that voting is not a fundamental right could embolden state lawmakers to push for further restrictions on advance voting and mail-in ballots, said Jamie Shew, election officer for Douglas County — Kansas' fifth most populous county.

The constant changes in election law are also confusing not only to election officials, but to voters, Shew said.

"I've had two voters who came in this morning, and they're like, 'Well, I read the paper about signature verification. Is my signature going to get tossed out?'" he recalled. "They were really nervous about it."

Election laws had been fairly constant since the passage of the 1965 Voting Rights Act by Congress, Shew said. But that changed in 2013, when the U.S. Supreme Court tossed out a key provision of that act, he said.

EVs

A new rule from the Environmental Protection Agency requires that about 56% of all new vehicle sales be electric by 2032, along with at least 13% plug-in hybrids or other partially electric cars. Auto companies are investing billions in factories and battery technology in an effort to speed up the switch to EVs to cut pollution, fight climate change — and meet the deadline.

EVs are a key part of Biden's climate agenda. Republicans led by presumptive nominee Donald Trump are turning it into a campaign issue.

Younger people are more open to eventually purchasing an EV than older adults. More than half of those under 45 say they are at least "somewhat" likely to consider an EV purchase. About 32% of those over 45 are somewhat likely to buy an EV, the poll shows.

But only 21% of U.S. adults say they are "very" or "extremely" likely to buy an EV for their next car, according to the poll, and 21% call it somewhat likely. Worries about cost are widespread, as are other practical concerns.

Range anxiety — the idea that EVs cannot go far enough on a single charge and may leave a driver stranded — continues to be a major reason why many Americans do not purchase electric vehicles.

About half of U.S. adults cite worries about range as a major reason not to buy an EV. About 4 in 10 say a major strike against EVs is that they take too long to charge or they don't know of any public charging stations nearby.

Freshwater mussels

"This is about awareness. I think of mussels, but really what I do is I think of these rivers, and I do think we have a job to make sure that those rivers are around for future generations," he said.

The Fish and Wildlife Service said that several water authorities in Texas including the Brazos River Authority, Lower Colorado River Authority, Trinity River Authority, and Tarrant Regional Water District have entered into voluntary conservation agreements. These agreements outline actions river authorities can take to reduce threats to the species, like making sure there is enough water flowing in rivers and addressing water quality for mussels to thrive.

"Creative collaboration with Central Texas river authorities has led to some groundbreaking conservation actions making it possible to list the Texas fawnsfoot as threatened," Amy Lueders, the agency's southwest regional director, said in a press release.

"That's important because it opens the door to more flexibility for solutions that reduce the threats to these mussels while boosting water quality in the watershed," Lueders added.
